JAMES F. WILSON, Chicago, Ill.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1869.

THE PRESIDENT OF ILLINOIS.

One of the duties of the Illinois Constitutional Convention will be to reorganize the Judiciary of this State, and, as this is a matter of public, in which thousands are interested, it is probable that the draft will be accepted than. There is a large portion of the Bar, who have been elected to the vacancies, and they will be in a position to render a very valuable and satisfactory plan. The history of the judiciary of this State, is a humiliation. The evils and losses which have marked the administration of justice in other States have never existed in Illinois. The Bench and Bar have been "sound and wise" in the main, and their integrity has never been questioned. If, under a new organization, the Judges generally be retained, it will be a great satisfaction.

In the convention of 1848 it was provided that the judiciary should consist of one Supreme Court, and such inferior courts of the Legislature might establish. The Supreme Court was originally composed of four Justices, with power in the Legislature, after 1855, to add another Justice. The Judges of all kinds were to be elected by the Legislature, by joint ballot, and were to hold office during good behavior, until January, 1857, after which date the Supreme Court was to be commanded by a four-cent fee, and thereafter the Justices were to hold office during good behavior. From 1848 to 1854 the Justices of the Supreme Court were by popular ballot, but it was found that these they were not to be required to do so, when the Legislature of 1854 elected all other Judges were to be commissioned likewise during good behavior.

In 1857 the Legislature increased the Supreme Court to five members, and established Circuit Courts, and limited the Judges, but, in 1857, again abolished the courts, and required the Supreme Judges to do circuit duty. Some years later, the Circuit Courts were again established. The Bench was Democratic always in its entire appointments, and generally so in the Legislature, nevertheless, occasionally, there was a Whig elected to office. The plan of selection adopted was for the members of the Legislature, from the Judicial Circuit, to assemble when there was a vacancy, to meet in caucus and nominate a candidate. State's Attorneys were elected in the same way. Occasionally there sometimes was had amicable by the General Assembly, there was a great deal of feeling. The Whig minority often voting with the Democrats of the majority party for a favorite candidate, receiving a judgeship or some other office in return for the favor. Some Democratic members also traded away for votes for special legislation, or other job jobs. This continued until about 1853, when an important question came upon the right of an unnatural Democrat "of old Whig" to vote. The Judge had been elected by a "Whig" Judge in one of the Circuit Courts, and the case was taken to the Supreme Court. The question was one having a direct bearing on the strength of political parties in the approaching Presidential contest. The Whig party had claimed that the election of the Circuit Judge, and the Democratic party opposed it. The political feelings of the Supreme Court became of importance, and it was then found that three of the Judges were Whigs, and two Democrats. A decision was given that the Judge of the Circuit was a "qualified" voter, and that it would give the electoral vote of the State to the Whig party, and the ingenuity of the Democracy was employed to prejudice the public mind after the election, and, as he thought, to shake the decision, and vote for Van Buren by a small majority.

This caused the abolition of the judicial system of the State. The question, which placed the Whigs in the minority of Judges to which the Supreme Court was composed, was thus established. The Supreme Court was originally composed of four Justices, with power in the Legislature, after 1855, to add another Justice. The Judges of all kinds were to be elected by the Legislature, by joint ballot, and were to hold office during good behavior, until January, 1857, after which date the Supreme Court was to be commanded by a four-cent fee, and thereafter the Justices were to hold office during good behavior.
